

The Do Not Call restrictions should remain in place. The intrusion of telemarketing calls are more than a mere annoyance. Telemarketers don't care whether they're interrupting family dinner, homework, people who work at home, sleeping babies; making an elderly or physically challenged person walk to the phone; waking someone who works the night shift; or soliciting someone who is mentally disabled or senile. Consumers pay for phone service and should have the last say about who is able to contact them at home.
